2007 Winning Entry

... Winning the National Missing Children's Poster Contest has been amazing. My State honored me in a ceremony at my school. Lots of important people in our government showed up, along with my family and friends. I also met our Governor in Columbus. Then we traveled to Washington...Being there really made me think about how big of a difference this contest can make. I entered because I wanted to help bring missing children home to see their parents."

This picture that I made represents the pathway leading to home. There are names of children who are missing on the path and around the world. The world is represents all the children of the world who are missing, endangered, runaway, or have been abducted and the house on top of the world is where they are all going to. The path represents the path leading home!

2004 Winning Entry

My drawing shows some of the ways children can be safe, such as using the buddy system. Another is the "tummy yell," which draws attention to you if someone attempts to kidnap you. The third is not to talk to strangers, and the last is always to listen to your parents— your parents know what's best for you and will always try to protect you.
